ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I want to thank the creator of the original story, “Two Wolves.” I want to thank Rudra Bose for his beautiful illustrations and Marvi Jatoi for her sketches and designs. I want to thank my editor, advisor, and friend, Kate Magram, for her extraordinary expertise, relentless pursuit for excellence, and her vision. And I want to thank Oksana Kosovan for her artistic formatting.

I want to thank everyone in my Pre-K community for their advice, feedback, and inspiration. Your incredible work everyday is crucial and inspirational.

And I want to thank Elio Klein, age five, who suggested having a third yellow wolf. Elio and I have had conversations about the two wolves inside of us for years, reflecting on the power of being true to oneself while also considering the needs of others.

When your parent asks you to clean up, what do they say?
What do you hear inside of you?

When your teacher wants you to take turns, what do they sound like?
What do you hear inside of you?

When your friend wants you
to share, how do they say it?
What do you hear inside of you?

There is a famous story in which a grandparent tells their grandchild that there are two wolves inside of us, both howling
to get our attention.

There is a green wolf that likes “green” choices and encourages us
to clean up, to take turns,
and to share.
